collected data in real time. For example, since mechanical energy depends on mass, position and velocity, the time variation of potential and kinetic energy of an object can be displayed graphically in real time. The user just needs to enter the mass of the object and the appropriate energy equations ahead of time.

From a physics standpoint, there's no real reason why the arrow of time should by necessity be moving forward. The most common explanation is that in the very distant past, the universe had a high degree of order (or low entropy). Because of this "boundary condition," the natural laws are such that the entropy is continuously increasing.
